A RESCUE IN MID-OCEAN.

How the Crew of a Shipwrecked Vessel were Saved by the Cunarder Parthia.

On a certain Saturday the well known Cunard steamship Parthia was between 400 and 500 miles distant from the west coast of Ireland, having sailed from the port of Boston on the previous Saturday. For some hours a low barometer had given warning of a coming storm. The breeze was tresh on the port quarter, with a long fellowing sea, over which, under the mpulse of propelier and canvas, the beautiful moided hull of the great House Furnishing Goods steamship rushed like a locomotive, raising a roar of thunder at her bows and carving out the green, grass-clear water with her stem into two oilsmooth combers, which broke just abuft the fore-rigging and rushed with a swirl and brilliance of foam to join the long, glittering snow-line of the wake astern. There was a plefaint, and under it, like a scattering of browd smoke, the send went floating swiftly. In the South and West the aspect of the heavens was protenof color and a line of horizon as crew as you look upon a house-top in to the height of the chain-plates. sharply marked as a ruling in ink.

The gale was evidently to come from this quarter, and, sure enough, before eight bells in the afternoon it was blowing a hurricane from the raised a tremendous sea. The Par; hia order was given.
